Creative Arts Complex changes names

By Pete Smith
Reflector Staff Writer

A lack of funds has resulted in a name change for the Creative Arts Complex.

Dominic Cunetto, a professor of Communication, said the Creative Arts Complex has become the Communication Building after a decision from members of the department and the university.

Former MSU President James D. McComas originally named the building the Creative Arts Complex.

The plans included homes for not only the Communication Department, but also the art, music and theater departments. The project halted abruptly after only one department had been completed by the university.

"We don't have the funds. One theater doesn't make a complex," Cunetto said.

Cunetto said changing the name to the Communication Building does "clarify things much better."

Another instructor in the communication department contributed the changes to "politics."

She also said politics invoked other department projects to be cancelled.

"Even the most basic things can't receive funding. Programs will be less adequate and opportunities will be limited," the communication instructor said.

John Forde, a professor of Communication, said though he agreed with the change, "it would have been nice to ask the students."

"I think they should change it if no other departments will be here," Lynn Henderson, a Communication major, said.

"They haven't asked any other students in other buildings, so I don't think they should have asked us," she said.

"I like the name CAC better," Julie Ormon, another communication major, said.

"I don't think people are going to recognize it as the Communication Building," Ormon said.

Ormon said it was a "shame" officials "don't have funding for the CAC when funding goes for other things on campus."
